of Lake Superior Ojibwe

Saturday, December 3, 2022

10:00 AM – 11:30 AM, CST via Zoom

Native communities increasingly have become sacrifice zones for extraction industries and projects no other communities want. Patty Loew, Northwestern University journalism professor, will explore these environmental threats and the solidarity movements in Native America that have formed against them. She will also discuss the importance of honoring Native land and the wisdom, insights, and challenges for us today in relation to care for the earth and all of creation.

Patty Loew, Ph.D., is a professor in the Medill School of Journalism and former director of the Center for Native American and Indigenous Research at Northwestern University. Dr. Loew is the author of four books. Her book, Seventh Generation Earth Ethics, won the 2014 Midwest Book Award for Culture. Loew has produced many documentaries for public and commercial television. She has written extensively about Ojibwe treaty rights, sovereignty, and the role of Native media in communicating Indigenous world views. She works with Native youth, teaching digital storytelling skills as a way to grow the next generation of Native storytellers and land stewards.
